

Working Resources

Helping Companies Assess, Select, Coach and Retain Emotionally Intelligent People

Newsletter

Sustaining Results: Balancing People, Values and Business

In the last few years several books have addressed why some companies are more enduring than others. What distinguishes the great from the merely good? What factors contribute to sustaining success in today's rapidly changing economic environment? Built to Last, Good to Great, Hidden Value, The Knowing-Doing Gap, and Peak Performance are just a few of the books that are providing answers.

Really great companies, even in bad times, place people and values first. The obsession with stock prices has obscured our vision. The late 90's caused companies to lose their way. The current economic shake-up will cause them to find their way again, or sink. The link between people and the bottom line is becoming clearer. Organizations that succeed over time are those that have a strong values-driven culture. They are people-centered organizations.

The quality of the interaction with and among employees drives the quality of products and services. Treating employees with dignity and respect pays off in how customers are treated and in how the business performs.

Many organizations seem to forget the connection between customers, employees, and financial results. If you want to have great business results, you need to have customers who believe that they're getting excellent treatment from the company. In order to do that, you must have employees who are motivated, committed, and using their talents.

The best companies are able to get extraordinary results because they lead with people-centered values. Values come first. After clearly identifying and defining core values, these companies ensure that their business strategy is consistent with people's values. This violates the "business first" mentality so common in today's organizations. By doing things this way, successful, enduring companies have been able to align the company's purpose with the spirit of their employees, capturing their emotional as well as intellectual energies.

Dr. Maynard Brusman is a consulting psychologist and trusted advisor to the senior leadership team. He is the president of Working Resources, a human resources consulting, training, and executive coaching firm.

We specialize in helping companies assess, hire, coach and keep top talent; executive selection; leadership consulting; 360-degree feedback; change management; interpersonal communication skills; emotional intelligence; performance improvement; culture surveys; career development and executive coaching.

Dr. Brusman is a highly sought-after speaker and workshop leader. He leads mission, values, and vision retreats.

"Maynard Brusman is one of the foremost coaches in the United States. He utilizes a wide variety of assessments in his work with senior executives and upper level managers, and is adept at helping his clients both develop higher levels of emotional intelligence and achieve breakthrough business results. As a senior leader in the executive coaching field, Dr. Brusman brings an exceptional level of wisdom, energy, and creativity to his work."—Jeffrey E. Auerbach, Ph.D., President, College of Executive Coaching

He has been chosen as an expert to appear on radio and TV, MSNBC, CBS Market Watch, and in the Wall Street Journal, San Francisco Chronicle, and Fast Company magazine.

Working Resources

55 New Montgomery Street, Suite 505
San Francisco, California 94105

San Francisco and Marin locations

Telephone: 415-546-1252

Toll free: 800-993-3354

Fax: 415-721-7322

E-mail: mbrusman@workingresources.com

Website: www.workingresources.com

Successful, enduring organizations offer their employees more than a job— they offer a sense of community, security and mutual trust and respect. Although these concepts may be out of favor, they are at the heart of what it means to unlock the value hidden in organizations. Charles A. O’Reilly III and Jeffrey Pfeffer talk about this in their book, Hidden Value: How Great Companies Achieve Extraordinary Results with Ordinary People (2000). They emphasize that this hidden value is not scarce or unique; it can be found in all companies. It resides in the minds and hearts of its people. But most organizations squander this resource and even ignore it.

Underlying the over-stated cliché that “people are our most important asset” is a deeper truth— to the extent that any organization can truly become people-centered, it will increase its chance of success. Most organizations do not tap into the energy of their people by connecting through values. Successful companies place high importance on their values and the alignment between values, strategies and their people. Aligning values, strategies and management practices may be simple to understand but it is very difficult to actually implement.

In the conventional way of designing strategy, executives answer two fundamental questions:

1. What business are we in?
2. How shall we compete?

This is reasonable, rational and likely exciting only for those at the top engaging in this intellectual exercise. It is not engaging to those charged with implementing the strategy. It does not engage anyone on an emotional level. After the strategy is announced, only then are managers encouraged to ensure that the “values” and practices of the organization are aligned with the strategy. The message is to pick values that fit the strategy. And only afterwards are lower-level managers and employees involved in order to get “buy-in.”

A values-based view of strategy starts with a set of fundamental values that are energizing to everyone in the organization, especially front-line employees. These values are capable of unlocking the human potential of their people. Such values may include fun, fairness, challenge, trust, respect, community and family. All management practices are screened for how they are consistent with these core values. In this approach to management, strategy comes last, after the values and practices are discovered and aligned, and after the company produces capabilities that set it apart.

“We put our employees first, our customers second, and our shareholders third. In that order it works and out of that order nothing works.”—Herb Kelleher of Southwest Airlines

It is crucial that the organization has a well defined competitive strategy that helps it make decisions about how and where to compete, but these strategic decisions are secondary to living a set of values and creating the alignment between values and people.

Companies such as Southwest Airlines, The Home Depot, The Men’s Wearhouse, SAS Institute, AES, New United Motor Manufacturing, Inc. and Cisco Systems are examples of organizations that place people and values first.

“Most business practices repress our natural tendency to have fun and socialize. The idea seems to be that in order to succeed you have to suffer....When people feel connected to something with a purpose greater than themselves, it inspires people to reach for levels they might otherwise not obtain...Our business is based on human potential.”—George Zimmer, founder and CEO of The Men’s Wearhouse

In his book Good To Great, Why Some Companies Make the Leap...and Others Don’t, Jim Collins discovered some fundamental differences between companies that outperformed the market and comparison companies that were “merely good.”

The good-to-great companies founded their strategies on a deep understanding of answers to three key questions:

1. What can we be the best in the world at?
2. What drives our economic engine?
3. What are we deeply passionate about?

You can’t manufacture passion or “motivate” people to feel passionate. Those companies that discovered their passion tapped into an energy that led them to generate cumulative stock returns that beat the general stock market by an average of seven times in fifteen years.

A wealth of empirical evidence shows the effectiveness of a people-centered approach that delivers value to the customer, the employee, the organization, and the shareholders (cited by O’Reilly and Pfeffer in Hidden Value, Harvard Business School Press, 2000):

One study found that by using multiple samples and measures, a change of one standard deviation in an index of innovative human resource management practices produced increases of $20,000 to $40,000 in stock market value per employee. Another study reported that companies that were one standard deviation higher in their use of high-performance work practices enjoyed more than $27,000 in increased sales per employee, $18,000 in increased market capitalization and $3,800 in profits as well as a decrease in employee turnover.

A study of the five-year survival rate of 136 companies that made initial public offerings in 1988 revealed that those companies that survived at a much higher rate were those that emphasized the importance of their people and offered rewards to everyone, not just senior management.

Similar results are found internationally. In Germany, a study found that companies that place employees at the core of their strategies produced higher shareholder returns than industry peers. And Korean enterprises discovered that dedicated positioning strategies appeared to be executed more effectively when organizations exhibited a high level of commitment to their employees.

What People-Centered Companies Do

According to Pfeffer and O'Reilly in Hidden Value, three common themes underlie the things that successful companies do to develop and tap the potential of their people:

1. The company has a clear, well-articulated set of values that are the foundation for management practices that provide for the company's competitive success.
2. The company has a remarkable degree of alignment and consistency in the people-centered practices that express its core values.
3. Senior managers in these companies (not just the founders or the CEO) are leaders whose primary role is to ensure that the values are maintained and constantly made real to all of the people who work in the organization.

The most visible characteristics of successful companies are their values and the fact that the values come first even before stock price. Why are values so important? The reason is that money by itself isn't sufficient for motivating long-term high performance. Most of us need to believe that what we are doing makes a difference to others and that our work is important. We also want to feel that we are valued as people. We want to be respected for who we are, not simply for what we do.

It is not enough to articulate values and to put them into formal company literature. They must be living values that show up in the day to day operations. They form the basis of organizational culture in which people share expectations that guide behaviors.

An example is a company that values "fun," that encourages smiling and laughter, where people can use their gifts and skills to make a difference without fear of being squelched, where creativity and interpersonal relationships are important. Southwest Airlines and Walt Disney come to mind as examples of companies that live this value.

Critical areas where values show up are during the hiring process where potential employees are screened for fit with the culture, training and development opportunities, an emphasis on information sharing, team-based systems, and in rewards and recognition programs.

You do not create core values. You discover them by looking inside. Ideology has to be authentic to the people within the organization. Ask yourself: "What core values do we truly and passionately hold?" You should not confuse values that you think the organization ought to have, but does not, with authentic core values. Those authentic core values that have been weakened over time can still be considered a legitimate part of the core ideology, as long as you acknowledge to the organization that you must work hard to revive them.

As we continue into this new century with new uncertainties, companies will need to draw on the full creative energy and talent of their people. Why should people give full measure? Confronted with an increasingly mobile society, cynicism about corporate life, and an expanding entrepreneurial segment of the economy, companies more than ever need to have a clear understanding of their people and their values in order to make work meaningful and thereby attract, motivate and retain outstanding people. There must be a balance with people, values and business.

15 Questions to Ask to Create a People-Centered Organization

Source: John Miller, QBQ! The Question Behind the Question: Practicing Personal Accountability in Business and in Life, www.qbq.com.

Once core values are clearly defined and articulated, then they should become living values that get communicated and reinforced continually. Otherwise they do not do much good. In the absence of repetitive reminders of these values, other implicit and negative values can take over, such as individual ambition at the expense of team work. The only insurance against such undermining is to constantly reinforce values in both language and in actions.

John Miller author of QBQ! The Question Behind the Question: Practicing Personal Accountability in Business and in Life, (www.qbq.com), suggests asking some key questions in order to stay connected with core values:

1. How can I reinforce and communicate our core values on a daily basis?
2. How can I create and communicate a clear vision for the part of the business that I manage?
3. What can I do to help others understand how our values drive our strategies?
4. How can I provide the people with whom I work with clear performance objectives that support our values?
5. How can I create an atmosphere in which people feel included and valued?
6. What can I do to ensure that everyone is heard?
7. How can I help my people succeed?
8. How can I show people they're important to our success?
9. What can I do to maximize the talents of those who work with me?
10. How can I help people learn from their mistakes?
11. What can I do to ensure that people have the knowledge, skills and tools they need to be successful?
12. How can I build better relationships with my customers?
13. How can I increase the value my customers receive?
14. How can I build better relationships with my suppliers?
15. What can I do to build strong relationships with the local community?

Working Resources

Dr. Maynard Brusman

Consulting Psychologist and Executive Coach

Mail: P.O. Box 471525

San Francisco, California 94147-1525

Helping Companies Assess, Select, Coach and Retain Emotionally Intelligent People